Frida Kahlo was born on 6th July 1907 in Mexico City, Mexico. Her home was called 'The Blue House' because of its bright blue walls. It is now a museum dedicated to Kahlo's life and work. As an adult, she lied about her age to link with the Mexican revolution in 1910.

When Frida was six years old she contracted polio which left her right leg to grow much thinner and shorter than her left leg. This was one of the reasons she wore long, colourful Mexican skirts and dresses and exotic jewellery which she loved so much.

When Kahlo was attending school to study medicine, she was in a serious bus accident which left her bedridden for a long time and meant she suffered from back pain for the rest of her life. In order to pass the time while recovering she began to paint, focusing on self portraits.

Over the whole of her life Kahlo continued to paint portraits, self-portraits and other paintings showing important moments in her life. In 1937 she painted a portrait of her and her husband Diego Rivera after they were married. She would also use painting to help her express strong emotions and feelings like in her painting 'The Two Fridas'.

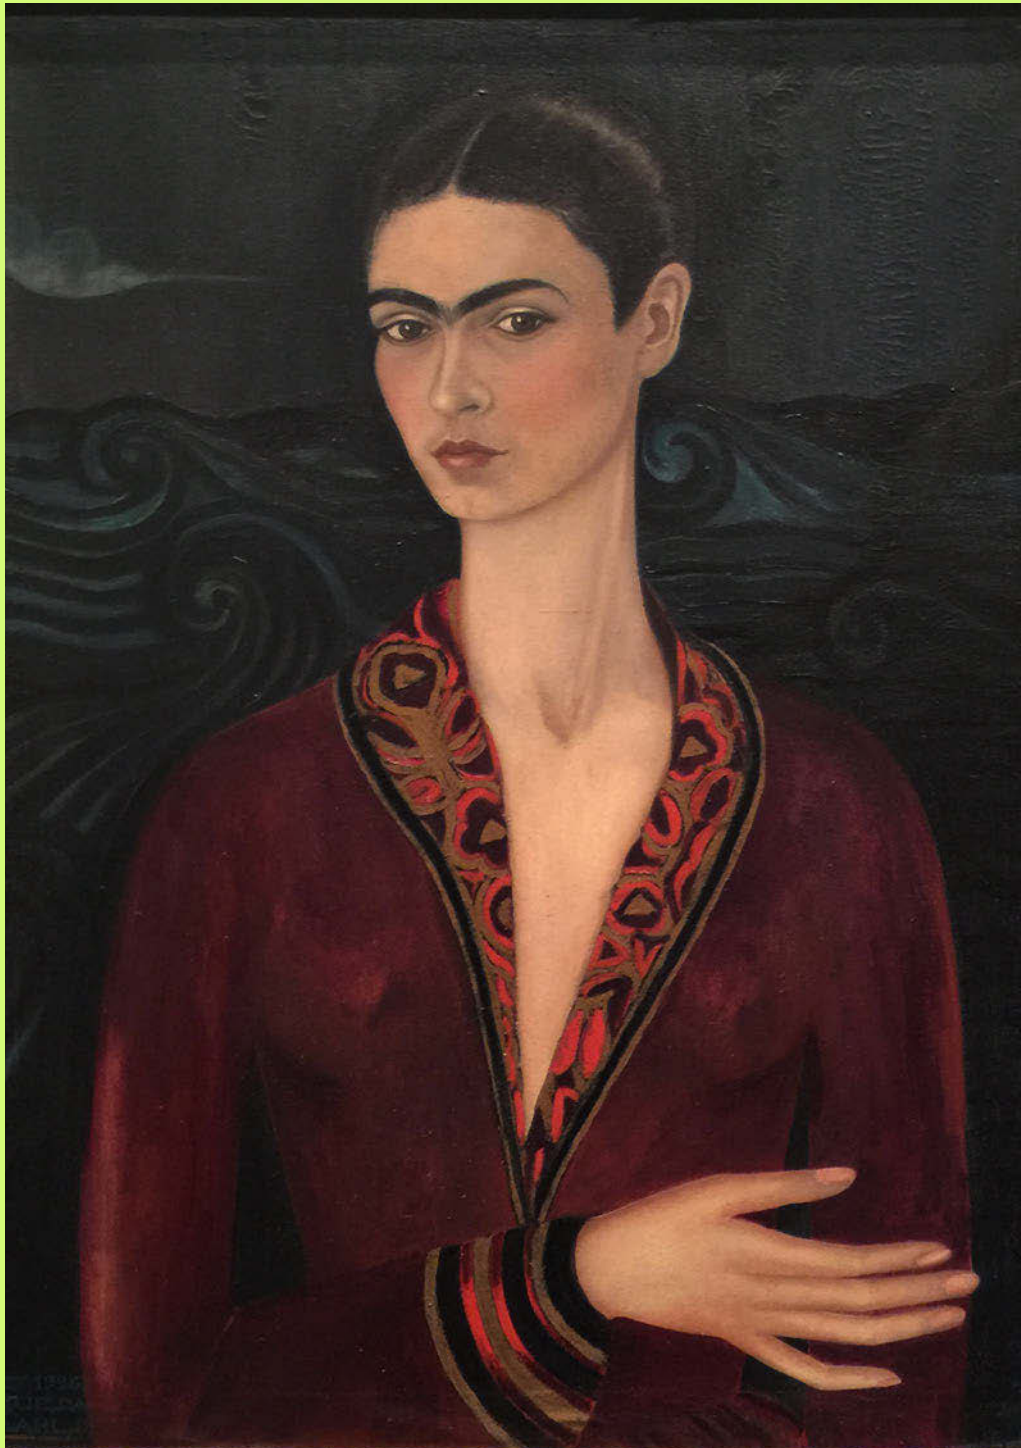

In 1939 André Breton saw her work and labelled her as a surrealist artist, which she disagreed with. Breton helped her enter her work into exhibitions across America and Paris where her work was purchased by the famous French gallery the Louvre. This was the first work by a 20th century Mexican artist purchased by such a famous gallery.

Kahlo's work has set many records. Her painting 'Roots' was sold for $5.6 million which is the largest amount a piece of Mexican art has sold for.
